Applying Reconciliation: Work at the Intersection of Indigenous Rights & Anthropology

Wednesday, September 17, 2025, 4:00-5:30pm MT

In Canada, truth and reconciliation does not “just happen.” It involves lifetimes of effort done by a wide range of leaders and professionals, including anthropologists. This virtual session brings together three practicing, professional, applied anthropologists working with and for Indigenous communities in BC, talking about what it’s like to support some of the nuts and bolts that move forward the work of truth and reconciliation.

Please join us for this thoughtful discussion.

Gretchen Fox

Anthropologist with the First Peoples Cultural Council (FPCC)’s Heritage Program.

Craig Candler

Cultural anthropologist and Founder and CEO of Reciprocity Research

Natasha Burgoyne

Title and Rights Lead for the Ktunaxa Nation Council

Guiding questions for speakers and discussion

1. [All]: Who do you work for and what is it like being an anthropologist today working with or for Indigenous communities?
2. [Natasha lead]: What is anthropology to you and how do you do anthropology?
3. [Gretchen lead]: What is reconciliation to you and where do you see the work of anthropology, and of truth and reconciliation, going in the future? What opportunities do you see for students, practitioners and communities?
4. [Natasha lead]: When it comes to reconciliation, what opportunities or threats do you think anthropologists working beyond the university should be paying most attention to? And what questions should we be thinking about?
5. [All]: If students are interested in following in your footsteps, what advice would you have for them? What kind of supports exist or need to be created?

A summary of our September 2025 virtual meetup

Applying Reconciliation: Work at the Intersection of Indigenous Rights & Anthropology

"Taking an honest view of the past and having the willingness to follow the lead of Indigenous communities and Indigenous anthropologists can support these opportunities to reframe who is the expert and who owns the knowledge. And that leads to necessary shifts in research design and how anthropology is done."

- Gretchen Fox, Anthropologist with the First Peoples Cultural Council (FPCC)'s Heritage Program

"I'm a Ktunaxa warrior. It's my life's work to maintain cultural practices. When I do anthropology I'm looking at our culture through time - where we've been and where we are now."

"That continuity of relationships, that continuity of being asked back is the opposite of parachuting in. But there is a cost: keeping a relationship takes energy. There's not that many communities you can build those kinds of relationships with and maintain over time."

- Craig Candler, Cultural anthropologist and Founder and CEO of Reciprocity Research Inc.

"Settler colonial society needs healing too. Look around and recognize that you're on ancestral lands and find healing here."

- Bernard Perley, Tobique First Nation, New Brunswick, Institute for Critical Indigenous studies at the University of British Columbia, past President CASCA
